Four hundred of the faithful old guard—fans who would not doubt hasten out to the baseball park in midwinter if they thought they could see half a contest, sat and shivered through the Washington-Milwaukee bargain afternoon in baseball yesterday. They were a disappointed lot, too, for almost everybody who endured the drizzle of the first game confidently believed the locals would have no trouble in getting a grip on the Brewers and holding them down until the end of the game was in sight. But the reverse happened. The visitors got the gauge of the wind and located the distance between Colonel Lee's position in the box and the home plate in the conflict, and almost every shot he fired struck a visiting bat.

The fusillade kept up until the end of the fifth, when after getting a clump of four doubles and a single, which netted Hughes Duffy's followers five runs, Dale Gear was called from his typewriter, where he was industriously thumping out notices to the members of the baseball players' association advising them to hold out for more salaries and denying the newspaper statements that Buck Ewing's baseball college would turn out enough graduates in the spring to equip any league in the business. Paying the typewriter is much more to Gear's fancy now, says than playing ball, and he is considerably more successful in the former occupation, but he went into the lost cause yesterday with a large lump of confidence in his ability to wallop the Brewers, notwithstanding the fact that they had a lead of eight runs. And he would have done so had his associates been able to accumulate nine more runs than they did. Gear did his part of the work entirely satisfactorily, as he was up to the Senators to do some hitting they pushed their business sticks around in a wild endeavor to connect with one of Pitcher Garvin's drops and usually without any results. Once in a while a local fellow would hit a four or even a home run, but the spectators would cheer long and loud, but whether these huzzas were in the nature of encouragement to the Washington players or merely a warning up exercise is, of course, unknown. If they were intended to give cheer and comfort and hope to the Mammittes they failed of their mission, for no amount of encouragement could have made the locals get down to real business.

When Winnie Mercer entered the box in the second game, the tip went around that he was in rare form and that the batting records of the Milwaukee gentlemen would be smashed into smithereens. Winnie was, in truth, in splendid shape for working, and he is equally true that none of the Brewers hit him very hard or at opportune moments, and had it not been for a stupid play on the part of Col. Bill Clarke it is extremely doubtful if the men from the West would have circled the bases all day. In the sixth inning, with one man out and Anderson on first, Gilbert dropped the ball in front of the plate and made a hurry up dash for first. Clarke leisurely picked up the sphere, and, taking careful aim, proceeded to pitch a fast ball into Milwaukee second baseman, instead of to Grady. The ball hit Gilbert on the head and bounded over among the bleachers, and before it was returned both Anderson and Gilbert had scored. Whether Clarke was given the customary credit for hitting the head was unknown up to the hour of going to press, but several of his admiring friends are contributing to a fund to purchase him a second-hand medal won by a former roller skating professor. It is expected Grady will keep the medal as a souvenir of one of the most brilliantly stupid plays of the season.

Even with the handicap of Colonel Clarke's misplay, Mercer was able to win out, and with the exception of Dunagan, who collected three hits, none of the Senators did more to capture the game from a hitting point of view than did Mercer. His two singles were pretty ones, particularly the first, which scored along the foul line and jumped over the third bag, with Conroy a full foot away. There were no brilliant features displayed during the game. It was plain everyday ball, and rainy day ball, and when the game was over, umpire Hart called the contest at the conclusion of the seventh inning, assigning darkness as the reason.

Jones, Maloney and Gilbert tallied for Milwaukee in the initial inning of the first game, and again in the fourth. Jones, a new player from Waterbury, got over the plate with the fourth run for his side. But it remained for the fifth inning for Colonel Lee to be compelled to go 'way back and sit down. The Brewers mowed his curves all up, and he threw out the distress signal at the end of the inning, not, however, until after five runs had been scored on doubles by Anderson, Bone, Friel, and Hallman, and a single by Gilbert. Washington made two runs in the third inning, when Clingman singled and scored on Lee's triple. The local pitcher then got home on an effort to put out Farrell, who failed to touch the bag, which Maloney dropped, giving the Senator a chance to run to first.

In the second game, the Brewers broke the ball over the left fence in the second inning. Mercer tallied in the next on a hit and Dunagan's drive to right field, and in the fourth Grady and Clingman scored on the former's hit for one base, and the shortstop's hit in the seventh. Hughes' error and Clarke's out to Hallman in deep right enabled the local center fielder to increase the Senators' record by one run. Milwaukee did its run getting in the last two innings of the game. Anderson and Gilbert scored in the sixth on Clarke's error, and in the seventh Jones made the circuit of the bases.
